XX.3. - It is an honor for a man to cease from strife. The war has ceased. We thank God for peace. It was a bitter and bloody war. God grant we may have a real and remedial peace. The philosophy of religious hates and family feuds might have prepared our human judgments to anticipate all the horrors of civil conflict. But the half was not told us. I have no hyena-taste for disinterring the mangled four years which the quick hand of time has gracefully urned or rudely earthed. Enough the conclusion, heroic or humiliating, as you will it, that the older the world grows, the harder men fight. Conversely viewing it, shall we have the consolation, that principle is nobler, sacrifice more willing, virtue more adamantine, and therefore that we are as certain to enjoy the verities of peace as we have certainly endured the realities of war. Arguing from the multitudinous graves of Spottsylvania,...
